The relationship between graduate medical education and resident education in robotic surgery: A narrative review. Although robotic-assisted minimally invasive surgery has a proven safety profile and does not require lengthy training for optimal outcomes, the lack of residency-based training programs has limited the use of robotic-assisted techniques. Here, we aim to examine the relationship between graduate medical education and resident education in robotic surgery. A search was performed in MEDLINE, Scopus, Cochrane, and Google Scholar databases for any articles published in English from 1980 to 2017 on the relationship between graduate medical education and resident education in robotic surgery. We also sought to learn how this relates to the existing (nongraduate) medical education and inform the future of residency-based robotic-assisted minimally invasive surgery. A total of 33 articles on the relationship between graduate medical education and resident education in robotic surgery were identified. As of July 2013, more than 16,000 robotic-assisted laparoscopic surgeries have been performed in 617 institutions across the USA. Only a few residency programs and specific robotic surgical faculties, consisting of both faculty members and fellows, are available for training. The literature demonstrates a lack of resident programs that offer any form of structured training. This is likely a reflection of the current, uncertainty of the future of the residency program, as well as the limited evidence of the benefit of education in robotic surgery. Test for Bug 632871 the end of the ballgame for the Vultures last night in Minneapolis. Got to watch it on television. This was the Vultures biggest game thus far. I haven't seen one of these in years as they are generally losing. I remember when the Vultures won the first ever AL Pennant, they hadn't been to the World Series since that memorable year. The 1987 World Series would be the only time since they won their first Pennant that the Vultures were in the World Series, and even that was in a Wild Card season.
